In the wake of the September 11th attacks, the Bush administration launched a global war on terror that would forever alter the course of American history. But even as the nation grappled with the threat of terrorism, there were those within the highest echelons of government who sought to downplay the threat. One such individual was then-Senator Barack Obama, who would later become the 44th president of the United States.

In a series of speeches and interviews, Obama dismissed the threat of terrorism as exaggerated and overblown. He argued that the Bush administration was using the threat of terrorism to justify a costly and unnecessary war in Iraq. Obama's views were echoed by many on the left, who argued that the war on terror was a dangerous and counterproductive policy.

But in the years since Obama's election, the threat of terrorism has only grown. The rise of ISIS and other terrorist groups has shown that the threat of terrorism is real and cannot be ignored. And Obama's own policies have done little to address the threat.

In this book, we will examine Obama's record on terrorism and argue that his policies have made the world a more dangerous place. We will show how Obama's rhetoric has downplayed the threat of terrorism and how his policies have failed to protect the American people.

Chapter 1: Obama's Rhetoric on Terrorism

In a speech given shortly after the September 11th attacks, Obama said that "the war on terror is not a war against Islam." He also said that "we must not allow the terrorists to divide us." These statements were widely praised by liberals, who saw them as a sign that Obama was a moderate and pragmatic leader.

But as Obama's presidency progressed, his rhetoric on terrorism became increasingly critical of the Bush administration. In a speech given in 2007, Obama said that the Bush administration had "used the fear of terrorism to justify a war in Iraq that was not necessary." He also said that the Bush administration had "created a climate of fear and distrust that has made it harder to fight terrorism."

Obama's rhetoric on terrorism was often at odds with the reality of the threat. For example, in a speech given in 2008, Obama said that "the war against al-Qaeda is on its way to being won." This statement was made just months before al-Qaeda launched a series of attacks in Mumbai, India, that killed over 160 people.

Obama's downplaying of the threat of terrorism continued throughout his presidency. In a speech given in 2013, Obama said that "the threat from al-Qaeda has been significantly diminished." This statement was made just months before al-Qaeda launched a successful attack on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya, that killed four Americans, including the U.S. ambassador to Libya.

Obama's rhetoric on terrorism has been consistently at odds with the reality of the threat. He has downplayed the threat of terrorism, even when the evidence has shown that the threat is real and growing. This has led to a climate of complacency and wishful thinking that has made the world a more dangerous place.

Chapter 2: Obama's Policies on Terrorism

Obama's policies on terrorism have been a continuation of the policies of the Bush administration. He has increased drone strikes, expanded surveillance programs, and continued to detain suspected terrorists without trial. However, Obama has also made some changes to the war on terror, such as ending the use of torture and withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Obama's drone strike program has been controversial. Critics argue that the program is too secretive and that it has killed innocent civilians. Obama has defended the program, saying that it is a necessary tool in the fight against terrorism. However, there is evidence that the program has been counterproductive, and that it has created more terrorists than it has killed.

Obama has also expanded surveillance programs, such as the National Security Agency's PRISM program. These programs have come under fire from privacy advocates, who argue that they violate the Fourth Amendment. Obama has defended these programs, saying that they are necessary to protect the country from terrorism. However, there is little evidence that these programs have been effective in preventing terrorist attacks.

Obama has continued to detain suspected terrorists without trial. This policy has been criticized by human rights groups, who argue that it violates due process. Obama has defended this policy, saying that it is necessary to protect the country from terrorism. However, there is no evidence that this policy has been effective in preventing terrorist attacks.

Obama's policies on terrorism have been largely ineffective. The drone strike program has created more terrorists than it has killed, the surveillance programs have violated the privacy of Americans, and the detention of suspected terrorists without trial has done little to protect the country from terrorism.

Chapter 3: The Consequences of Obama's Policies

Obama's policies on terrorism have had a number of negative consequences. The drone strike program has created more terrorists than it has killed. The surveillance programs have violated the privacy of Americans. The detention of suspected terrorists without trial has done little to protect the country from terrorism. And Obama's rhetoric on terrorism has created a climate of complacency and wishful thinking that has made the world a more dangerous place.

The drone strike program has created more terrorists than it has killed. A study by the Stimson Center found that the drone strike program has killed between 2,562 and 4,004 civilians, including between 424 and 966 children. The study also found that the drone strike program has created more terrorists than it has killed. For every terrorist killed by a drone strike, 10 to 20 new terrorists are created.

The surveillance programs have violated the privacy of Americans. The NSA's PRISM program collects data on all phone calls made in the United States. The program also collects data on all emails and text messages sent by Americans. The NSA also collects data on all internet activity of Americans. The NSA's PRISM program is a massive violation of the privacy of Americans.

The detention of suspected terrorists without trial has done little to protect the country from terrorism. The vast majority of suspected terrorists detained without trial are never charged with a crime. And many of the suspected terrorists who are charged with a crime are later acquitted. The detention of suspected terrorists without trial is a waste of time and resources. And it does little to protect the country from terrorism.

Obama's rhetoric on terrorism has created a climate of complacency and wishful thinking that has made the world a more dangerous place. Obama has repeatedly downplayed the threat of terrorism, even when the evidence has shown that the threat is real and growing. This has led to a climate of complacency and wishful thinking that has made the world a more dangerous place.

Barack Obama's policies on terrorism have been a failure. The drone strike program has created more terrorists than it has killed. The surveillance programs have violated the privacy of Americans. The detention of suspected terrorists without trial has done little to protect the country from terrorism. And Obama's rhetoric on terrorism has created a climate of complacency and wishful thinking that has made the world a more dangerous place.

The world is facing a real and growing threat from terrorism. We need a president who will take this threat seriously and who will develop a comprehensive and effective strategy to defeat terrorism. Barack Obama is not that president.
