Imagine a life free from the constraints of money. No bills to pay, no budgets to balance. Just the freedom to live each day as you choose.

For Sarah van Oortmerssen, this is not just a dream but a reality. For over a decade, she has lived without money, relying on the generosity of others and the resources of the natural world.

Sarah's journey began in 2009 when she lost her job and her home during the global financial crisis. Faced with overwhelming debt, she made a radical decision: she would give up money altogether.

At first, it was a struggle. Sarah had to learn how to live off the land, foraging for food and building shelter. But as time went on, she discovered a new sense of freedom and purpose.

Today, Sarah lives in a small cabin in the woods. She grows her own food, collects rainwater, and uses natural materials to create everything she needs. She has no income, no bank account, and no possessions to speak of.

But despite her lack of money, Sarah is incredibly wealthy. She has a wealth of knowledge, skills, and experiences that most people can only dream of.

Sarah's story is a powerful reminder that money is not essential for a happy and fulfilling life. In fact, it can often be a barrier to our true potential.

By living without money, Sarah has shown us that it is possible to live a life of freedom, abundance, and connection. She has inspired countless others to question their own relationship with finances and to explore new possibilities.

In her book, "The Woman Who Lives Without Money," Sarah shares her incredible journey and offers practical advice for anyone who wants to live a more sustainable and fulfilling life.
