"The war had come to her town in the shape of a man. He was tall and thin, with a long, angular face that seemed to be always in shadow. He wore the uniform of the Free States Army, but his eyes were cold and empty, like the eyes of a snake.

He had come to her family's farm, looking for her brother. Sarat's brother had been fighting with the Free States Army, but he had been missing for weeks. The man said he was here to take Sarat and her family to safety.

But Sarat knew better. She knew that the man was not there to help them. She knew that he was there to take them away."
