Reich argues that the old model of work, based on mass production and mass consumption, is no longer sustainable. The global economy is now interconnected, and technology is changing the way we work and live. As a result, we need to create a new model of work that is more flexible, inclusive, and sustainable.

Reich's vision for the renewal of work is based on four key principles:

1. Invest in human capital. The most important investment we can make is in our people. We need to provide quality education and training for all workers, so that they can adapt to the changing economy.

2. Build a more inclusive economy. We need to create an economy that works for everyone, not just the wealthy. This means raising the minimum wage, expanding access to affordable housing, and providing paid family leave.
3. Promote sustainable growth. We need to grow our economy in a way that protects the environment and reduces inequality. This means investing in clean energy, sustainable agriculture, and public transportation.
4. Strengthen democracy. We need to create a more democratic economy, where workers have a voice in the decisions that affect their lives. This means increasing worker representation on corporate boards, promoting employee ownership, and strengthening labor unions.

Reich's vision for the renewal of work is a bold one, but it is also a necessary one. If we want to create a more just and sustainable economy, we need to start by changing the way we work.
