The Articles of Confederation were the first constitution of the United States. They were adopted in 1781, and they established a loose confederation of states. The Articles of Confederation gave the federal government very little power, and they did not provide for a strong national government.

By the mid-1780s, it was clear that the Articles of Confederation were not working. The federal government was too weak to deal with the problems facing the country, and the states were increasingly acting independently of the national government.

In 1787, a group of delegates from the 13 states met in Philadelphia to revise the Articles of Confederation. The delegates quickly realized that the Articles could not be revised, and they decided to create a new constitution.

The Constitutional Convention lasted for four months. The delegates debated a wide range of issues, including the structure of the federal government, the powers of the president, and the rights of citizens.

On September 17, 1787, the delegates to the Constitutional Convention signed the new Constitution. The Constitution created a new framework for the government of the United States. It established a strong national government with three branches: the legislative, executive, and judicial branches.

The Constitution has been amended 27 times since it was adopted in 1787. The amendments have clarified the powers of the federal government, expanded the rights of citizens, and addressed new issues that have arisen over time.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land. It is the foundation of the American government, and it has served as a model for constitutions around the world.
